Abstract: A Vietnamese-born American poet and writer, I left Vietnam with my family one day before the evacuation of Saigon. These poems that follow, “Proof”; “Love Poem to Tofu”; “Love Poem to Pho”; and “A bird of laughing feathers” are explorations of self, identity, and society.

Key words: Mong-Lan, Vietnam, American poetry, Vietnamese-American poetry, love poems Proof

in this city where you do not live you were born of Vietnam
the street on which you were born does not exist the city itself no longer exists on a map for its name has changed if you had continued to exist here if you had stayed after war’s end now 30 yrs later you would be walking down the street talking joking philosophizing suffering with friends you would be a closed-eyed bicycle-motor-riding adult married with children the house where you lived the first five years of your life was seized & therefore does not exist as you knew it it sits on a street whose name has changed no longer recognizable your grandparent’s house also appropriated now people live there eating making love defecating spinning new lives for themselves from the walls of your past in the city where you were born you do not now exist because the city no longer exists the grandparents whom you met in your imagination & memory did exist
& gave birth to your parents who exist in a different country & plane altogether not in this city of faint turquoise limestone whiteness & charcoal of your imagination

two handfuls of cities changed names through wars or revolutions the hospital where you were born still remains that exists & still keeps its name Hospital of Saint Paul does that prove anything?

Love Poem to Tofu

Everyday I open you up with a knife slice you in half boil eat you

O how I need you warm creamy-white loaded with vegetable protein how can I live without your textured taste?
I don’t even remember when we first met: it must’ve been in Saigon in a soup dish my mother made with tomatoes & a solitary flaming egg for many years I knew you made in California not as good as in Vietnam but now in Tokyo you once again become divine

you are exquisite plain dipped in soy sauce or nuoc mam with a bit of lemon & cayenne pepper

varieties of you I love silken firm braised tofu I feast upon you Love Poem to Pho

Yes, I am guilty

I am not a good Buddhist vegetarian when in Saigon or Hanoi, I sometimes sneak bowls of you from the vendor down the street for fifty cents or less always without meat bowls of pho clear fatless broth of chicken or beef

I sneak bowls of you past my other moral self a secret sin to remind me of days without pressure without animal flesh I slurp you down only the perfume of you

I slurp you as Asians are wont to do making noise to make the taste sweeter I slurp you with fresh cilantro  lemon  mint leaves  dragon pho leaves I slurp you with hot chili peppers tingling the tongue fresh green peppers of memory penetrating the palate rice noodles  hanging over chopsticks ubiquitous legs the Japanese say you have “a simple elegant taste” Vietnamese know you are never to be colonized at home I make you with a vegetable broth rice noodles & vegetables your broth transparent humble A bird of laughing feathers

A song gregarious

Concord to every cell & mitochondrion to every person all bodies nations neighbors sons daughters brothers & sisters of every skin color to those who breathe those who sleep

to those who kick & bother to dream to those who dream & die dreaming

Armistice to those with knives guns & bombs a nail a grenade on one’s back cactus scorched a board of thorns ashes knocking knocking

to those who die fighting limbs burned off eyes torched to those who are alive fighting limbs bombed off heart beating

A century in the forest meditating under a tree

Repose to those with mercurial hearts ailing

Peace to nocturnal invasions bodily invasions to the seers the blind & decrepit

To the pallbearers a flowing river of blossoms
NOTES

[3] “Love Poem to Pho” was originally published in the North American Review. Pho is Vietnam’s national soup, consisting of wide flat rice noodle, chicken or beef and its broth. Usually served with fresh vegetables such as lettuce, mints, chilies, etc.
